The story begins in the late 19th century, as young John McDermott leaves his home in Ireland to seek his fortune in the coal mines of Pennsylvania. He soon finds work in a dangerous mine, where he meets and falls in love with Mary O'Brien, a young Irish immigrant who works as a breaker boy. Together, they face the hardships of life in the coalfields, including poverty, discrimination, and the ever-present threat of death.

As the years pass, John and Mary raise a family of their own. Their son, Michael, follows in his father's footsteps and becomes a coal miner. Michael marries a woman named Sarah, and they have three children: Kathleen, Tommy, and Joey. The family lives a happy life, but their happiness is shattered when Michael is killed in a mining accident.

Mary is devastated by Michael's death, but she finds solace in her children and grandchildren. She lives to see her grandchildren grow up and start families of their own. She also sees the coal industry change and become more mechanized. The old days of backbreaking labor are gone, but the dangers of mining remain.
