Ella Baker was a civil rights activist and organizer who played a pivotal role in the development of the Civil Rights Movement. She was a mentor to many of the movement's most prominent leaders, including Martin Luther King Jr., Rosa Parks, and Stokely Carmichael. Baker's work was often behind the scenes, but her influence was profound.

Baker was born in Norfolk, Virginia, in 1903. She grew up in a poor family, but she was determined to get an education. She attended Shaw University in Raleigh, North Carolina, and then went on to earn a master's degree from Columbia University. After graduating from college, Baker worked as a social worker in Harlem. She also became involved in the NAACP, where she quickly rose through the ranks.

In 1940, Baker was hired by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) to organize its voter registration drives. She quickly became a key figure in the SCLC, and she played a major role in the organization's success. Baker was also a key figure in the Montgomery Bus Boycott, which was a major turning point in the Civil Rights Movement. She helped to organize the boycott, and she played a key role in its success.

Baker's work was not limited to the SCLC. She also worked with other civil rights organizations, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). Baker was a strong advocate for youth involvement in the Civil Rights Movement, and she helped to train and mentor many of the young activists who played a key role in the movement.

Baker's work had a profound impact on the Civil Rights Movement. She was a tireless advocate for social justice, and she helped to lay the foundation for the movement's success. Baker died in 1986, but her legacy continues to inspire activists and organizers today.
