“There are no rules.”

This mantra encapsulates the core values of punk: individuality, nonconformity, and the rejection of authority. In the punk world, there is no dress code, no musical boundaries, and no prescribed way to behave. The only rule is to be yourself, and to express yourself however you see fit.

The Origins Of The First Rule

The first rule of punk has its roots in the DIY culture of the early punk scene. In the late 1970s, young people disillusioned with the music industry and the status quo began forming their own bands and labels. They made their own music, produced their own records, and booked their own gigs. In the process, they created a new music subculture that was independent of the mainstream.

The first rule of punk was a natural outgrowth of this DIY ethos. In a world where the rules were made by others, punks chose to create their own. They rejected the idea of conformity and embraced individuality. They believed that anyone could start a band, make a record, or write a zine. All that mattered was the passion and the desire to do it.
