David Thompson was a British-Canadian fur trader, explorer, and surveyor who played a major role in the exploration of the Canadian West. He was born in London in 1770 and came to Canada as a young man in 1784. He spent the next 30 years exploring the vast wilderness of western Canada, mapping rivers, lakes, and mountains, and establishing fur trading posts.

Thompson was a skilled surveyor and cartographer, and his maps were essential to the development of western Canada. He was also a keen observer of the natural world, and his journals are filled with detailed descriptions of the plants, animals, and people he encountered.

Thompson's story is an epic tale of exploration and adventure, and it is a must-read for anyone interested in the history of Canada.

Early Life and Career

David Thompson was born in London, England, on April 30, 1770. His father was a weaver, and his mother was a dressmaker. Thompson had little formal education, but he was a bright and curious child. He loved to read and explore, and he spent much of his time in the woods and fields around his home.

In 1784, when Thompson was 14 years old, he was apprenticed to the Hudson's Bay Company (HBC). The HBC was a fur trading company that operated in Canada and the United States. Thompson spent the next several years working at HBC posts in western Canada. He learned the fur trade business, and he also developed his skills as a surveyor and cartographer.

In 1797, Thompson left the HBC and joined the North West Company (NWC). The NWC was a rival fur trading company that operated in western Canada. Thompson spent the next 13 years working for the NWC, and he explored vast areas of the Canadian West. He mapped rivers, lakes, and mountains, and he established fur trading posts.

Exploration of the Canadian West

Thompson was one of the most important explorers of the Canadian West. He traveled over 50,000 miles by canoe, snowshoe, and horseback, and he mapped vast areas of the country. He was the first European to explore many of the major rivers and lakes of western Canada, including the Columbia River, the Fraser River, and the Athabasca River.

Thompson also made important contributions to the understanding of the geography of western Canada. He was the first to accurately map the Rocky Mountains, and he also explored the Arctic coast of Canada. His maps were essential to the development of western Canada, and they are still used today.

In addition to his work as an explorer, Thompson was also a keen observer of the natural world. He kept detailed journals of his travels, and he recorded his observations of the plants, animals, and people he encountered. His journals are a valuable source of information about the history of western Canada.

Later Life and Legacy

Thompson retired from the fur trade in 1812. He spent the rest of his life in Canada, where he worked as a surveyor and cartographer. He also wrote several books about his travels, including "Narrative of Explorations in Western America" and "New Light on the Early History of the Greater Northwest."

Thompson died in Montreal, Canada, on February 10, 1857. He was 86 years old. He is considered one of the greatest wilderness travelers of all time, and his legacy lives on in the many places he explored and mapped.

The Story of David Thompson is an epic tale of exploration and adventure. It is a story of a man who dedicated his life to exploring the vast wilderness of Canada. Thompson's story is a must-read for anyone interested in the history of Canada, and it is a testament to the human spirit of adventure.
